

I believe brains not background should decide which university you go to

I want to improve my communication skills

I can spare an hour a week

Is this you?

Then why not become a volunteer with The Access Project and tutor a bright young person from a disadvantaged background? As a volunteer tutor you'll support a 14 to 18-year-old to help them achieve their potential at GCSE or A-Level.

You can make a real difference - a young person on our programme is twice as likely to go to a top university than a student from a similar background who is not receiving additional support.

At the same time you'll be developing your own communication, coaching and planning skills and getting real job satisfaction. Our volunteers often say tutoring is the most rewarding hour of their week.

You don't need any teaching experience. You'll attend a three hour training session before you begin volunteering and you'll receive ongoing support with lesson planning, topic guidance and resources from our team.

You can tutor in person in a public place convenient to you, like your office, a cafe or library. Alternatively there is the option to become an online tutor for a young person in a different area which can be done from anywhere where you have access to a laptop and the internet.

What you need

- A degree in a subject to tutor it to A-Level and an A-Level in a subject to tutor it to GCSE.
- Subjects sought: Maths, English, Biology, Chemistry, Physics, Geography, History, French and Spanish. At A-Level only: Economics, Psychology and Politics.
- An hour a week across the school year.
- To be based in London, Birmingham or the Black Country for face-to-face tutoring as that is where we currently work. Or for online tutoring you can be based elsewhere, as long as you can travel to one of the locations above for the initial training session.
